New Local Food Community Website Goes Live

Freerangereview.com looks set to make local food the talk of the town

29 November, 2007 -- Freerangereview.com is a new community website that has been launched today to bring the foodie's who buy local food closer to the companies who produce/sell it. And vice versa!

It's not a campaign site, but it does believe that local food is best! It helps to promote seasonality, its better for our communities and its better for the environment. And the site is completely free for everyone to use too.

Every village, town and city has its local food stars, companies that make the extra effort to source locally or produce high quality foods for an ever more aware consumer to enjoy.

However, competition couldn't be tougher and for the local food company, the best and sometimes the only form of promotion is through recommendation and word of mouth from their loyal customer base.

Freerangereview.com is a social environment that will put this voice of local food online. A community where people really can shout about what's great about the food and companies on their doorsteps and where they can spread the word too, either by reviewing companies that are listed or listing those that are not.

The site is committed to boosting the profile of local food companies and encouraging their customers to review what's on offer and has many exciting plans to keep the voice of local food both loud and clear.
